

IN LOVING MEMORY

Muffin

Playful · Tenacious · Stubborn · Zeroed-in

Born to Rosie, a rescued pitbull, Muffin was the runt of her litter: a gray-and-white girl with a half-masked face, gray on the left, white on the right, that made her look endlessly curious.

She never felt sorry for herself. She got up, she wagged, she loved.

Her favorite game was fierce tug-of-war over a pillow. She ignored every distraction, dug in with everything she had, and when she finally ripped it away, she won like it mattered.

From about six months old, most days her small body shook with seizures. Heat set them off, so her family kept her world at 75 degrees or below and held her through every one.

The vet suspected a liver shunt; they were saving for the testing when she crossed the rainbow bridge due to extensive seizures at almost two.

Twenty-six books carry her name and her lesson: that asking for help is brave, and that a body which works a little differently is still a wonderful body.

Playful to the last, stubborn the whole way through, and zeroed in on the people she loved.
